WETLAND RESTORATION

Many wetlands are degraded due to anthropogenic activities, climate change impacts as well as Invasive Alien Species. Wetlands degradation hamper wetland functions, such as water quality protection, habitat for wildlife, flood prevention, carbon sequestration and climate change regulation.

To mitigate the negative impact on wetlands, the National Parks and Conservation Service strategically restores degraded wetlands throughout its jurisdiction for preservation of the ecological benefits they provide.

WHAT IS WETLAND RESTORATION

Wetland Restoration is the return of a degraded wetland or former wetland to its pre-existing natural functioning condition, or a condition as close to that as possible. It is a complex process that requires expertise, resources and commitment. Ideally, a successful restored wetland will mimic the functions of a healthy natural wetland.
